Mr. Springer's Corner

Parents, a reading strategy that you can work on at home with your children is "Close Reading." This is not a new strategy but it is a learning strategy that is getting a lot of attention lately. Close reading is used by students to dig deeper into a text and helps students analyze what they have read. At times when a text is complex or is extremely important, it may require a student to read it more than once. A close reading of a literary text is a complex and active process in which a student draws conclusions and inferences from a work in order to construct meaning, form connections, and develop critical-analysis skills. When you have your children read at home, ask them to read it two or three times to ensure they understand the information. Also, ask them to underline or highlight important words or phases to ensure they understand what they have read.
